During the second phase, lasting from late until the Japanese surrender, the Allies –consisting primarily of Australian and US forces–cleared the Japanese first from Papua, then the Mandate and finally from the Dutch colony. The battle marked the first major US victory against Japan and was a turning point in the war. Despite outnumbering the American forces at the start of the battle, which was extremely rare at this stage of war, Colonel Ezaki was unable to capitalize on the numerical advantage to secure a victory, which would have provided the morale boost that Japan desperately needed.
