The majority of published studies focused on language-based interactions are focused on English-only learners, despite the fact that social processes can be experienced differently by different groups, even within the same setting Rogoff and Angelillo, ; Tseng and Seidman, Children's growing ability to self-regulate their emotions also is evident in this period discussed more extensively later in this chapter. The goal was to see whether children would sort the objects by the salient perceptual property color or shape or by function.
