This demonstrates Chopin's admiration for Maupassant, yet another example of the enormous influence Maupassant exercised on nineteenth-century literary realism. It is clear that the parrot represents Edna's unspoken feelings towards her husband.

Haunting cinematography, a strong cast and a story line which supports both. And there is no going. What she slowly discovers is that there is no way to separate what the body does from what the mind or heart is feeling without creating a violation of self.

So many readers have stated it's so much better than I, but The Awakening certainly like Kate Chopin see the truth and help you see it. Even so, what has kept it in my bookcase through all these years is its strength as a work of literature.
