There is another type of common, partial-lucid dream in which people wake up from a dream and are able to return to it upon sleeping and change the course of the dream. Dennett separates the memory from the experience – the memory of a dream is first experienced consciously when it is recalled.

With the discovery of REM sleep, sleep came to be regarded as a heterogeneous process. By contrast, Windt defends an anti-skeptical view according to which dream reports can, at least under certain conditions, be regarded as trustworthy with respect to previous experience during sleep.
