Dreaming the impractical dream of becoming a painter, Lang roamed Paris. Includes bibliographical references and index. Certainly life began auspiciously for Fritz Lang, born to favorable circumstances. In 'Gravity's Rainbow,' Thomas Pynchon's profound phantasmagoria of our turbulences, some trenchant specters from Lang's films streak across the novel's lowering sky. The train from Paris to Vienna took him away from painting then and toward a future in film. One sinks into the book, riveted, but also races across it as its fascinations multiply. Create a Want Tell us what you're looking for and once a match is found, we'll let you know. An occasion is photographed from extreme low-to-true-ground angles, "which isn't justified in the continuity of the other shots in the sequence, unless it is seen, for example, by a child," in Sturm's words.
